Helpp Launches Free Platform Connecting Local Consumers and Service Providers

Glenwood Springs, Colorado - April 26, 2017 - Helpp, a Colorado based startup, today announced its free web-based application empowering anyone to make money using their skills and services by connecting them with local consumers. The company is currently looking for local businesses and individuals of all skill levels to join www.gethelpp.com.

Commented [JS1]: Should we insert text "without a middleman taking a cut." To emphasize that Helpp is really shaking things up

Unlike other Gig Economy companies, Helpp's web-based platform connects customers to local service providers allowing them to transact business for free. This allows all revenue to stay within the community by the people who earned it. Within the freemium model, Helpp also provides educational and training opportunities empowering individuals to start their own business, and is currently partnering with 3rd party providers to offer business tools individuals need to accomplish this.

"Not enough people wear enough hats," said Scott Hankinson, Founder and CEO of Helpp. "We all have skills and services others are willing to pay money for, but don't have an outlet to push them out to the world, or the know how to start their own business. Helpp is the solution."

Helpp is available to all ages, skill sets, and designed to promote business growth from individuals whether you're a babysitter looking for an after school gig, or an established home improvement business. Service providers create a free public profile listing their services, hourly rates, and experience making themselves searchable by consumers on the Helpp platform.
