Scott Callahan's Family Foundation Pledges Gift to Orlando's Dr. Phillips Center for the Performing Arts

A recently established philanthropic charity located in Winter Park, Florida, has signed a pledge of support to the Dr. Phillips Center this week for a $25,000 gift.

The Callahan Family Foundation has pledged a $25,000 gift to Dr. Phillips Center for the Performing Arts, an organization that delivers the arts to children through theater and educational programs. It is the Callahan Family Foundation's mission to be a catalyst for positive change in Central Florida by seeking out and supporting local organizations that effectively provide services for children and youth in the community. The Callahan family has a passion for the theater and is pleased for the opportunity to share the arts with the children and youth of Central Florida.

"We are grateful to Scott and the Callahan family for their kindness and generosity," said Dr. Phillips Center CEO Kathy Ramsberger. "This gift will help us continue to advance our mission and provide a space where creativity and education converge to nurture students and youth."

According to Ramsberger, this gift will go directly to the arts center's Arts for Every Life® annual campaign, which supports theater programs for children with special needs, underwrites scholarships and youth education programs, and more.

About the Foundation

The Callahan Family Foundation is a 501(c)(3) committed to giving back to the Callahan family's home cities of Orlando, Winter Park, and the surrounding communities. Providing support for local organizations that serve children, arts and culture, or the community in need as a whole are at the forefront of the Foundation's priorities. The Foundation is overseen by Scott Callahan of Winter Park and has created a legacy and a commitment for the Callahan family: to foster positive change and growth in central Florida.
