Product Innovation & Development

Fig Leaf Cushions Covers started out as founder Jack Faller's clever solution to a problem he faced living in the Pacific Northwest. In annoying quick succession, his expensive outdoor cushions would become mildewed and faded. As a serial inventor and entrepreneur, Faller studied the problem and developed a unique idea he couldn't believe nobody had thought of before: simply create new covers for existing cushions. It would save the money for brand new furniture, but also protect the environment by not tossing out perfectly good cushions which don't easily decompose in a landfill.

The first iteration of cushion covers Faller designed wound up being overly complex, using a buckle system to keep them in place. With experimentation, he came up with an elastic, form-fitting cover design which was both simple, elegant, and also gave the option of quickly changing up cushion designs to suit any season or décor. The result was a convenient product that could help anyone in America who owned outdoor furniture solve this common, expensive, and wasteful issue every home owner eventually faced.
