Description:

When ominous auroras warn of coordinated earthquakes, a tetrachromatic fifteen-year-old ambassador must decode Óðin's messages and rally his twin and friend to stop a shapeshifting army before the world fractures into ruin. Erik thought being an interstellar ambassador would mean interviews and weird fan mail. He didn't expect to read red auroras warning of war. He didn't expect a three-eyed giant to pick a fight in his backyard caves. He definitely didn't expect to be the one making life-or-death calls. With Finna's arrows, Kalli's rallying voice, and a runaway sculptor who knows more than he should, Erik faces shapeshifters, subterranean armies, and the maddeningly pretty green lights of an angry sky. The Meridian Loki built is still singing — and it's tuning the whole planet into a weapon. If they don't stop it, Earth will fall.

Author's background:

Íeda Jónasdóttir Herman was born 1925 in Reykjavik, Iceland. At age nineteen she married an American serviceman, and after WWII ended, they made their home in Illinois. Over the years they raised 10 children whom Íeda entertained with folktales of her homeland. Ieda graduated from the Chicago School of Interior Design and later the Institute of Children's Literature, in Connecticut. She has written numerous articles for newspaper and magazines, and has conducted community college adult education seminars. Her natural enthusiasm has energized seminars participants at libraries, schools, women's clubs, and community groups. After retiring in 2009, and with her family grown, Íeda wrote her memoirs, and has since continued to write and share stories about Iceland. Íeda passed away on Leif Erikson Day, October 9, 2019 in Iowa.

Heidi Herman retired from telecommunications, releasing her first children's book in 2015. Since then, she's published eleven additional works in four genres. This marks her third collaboration with her mother, Ieda.
